Awareness
When customers buy a product or service, they're typically looking for a solution to a problem.
In the awareness stage, you must let people know that you have a potential solution to their problem.
Content campaigns
E-books/whitepapers
Events/trade shows
Press releases
Social media
Webinars
Interest
Once a customer is aware of your company, you must pique their interest.
Just because they know your product or service exists as a potential solution to their problem doesn't mean they are automatically going to choose you.
In the interest phase, the customer actively researches products or services that will solve their problem, so you should make sure they are able to find your company (e.g., how does your product/website rank on Google?).

Decision
Make the decision easier by offering a smaller commitment at first, like a free trial.
You (and your company) need to feel relatable as well as authoritative to customers, like you know how to solve their problems.
You can also accelerate the decision-making process by selling your product as the only real solution to their problems or as being scarce.

Action
Once your customer has made a decision and is ready to act, you want to make it as easy as possible to purchase.
Review your final sales process to ensure maximum ease and comfort for your customers.
